

Why did Bruce Willis' managers allow him to continue to make multiple films in the past two years if it was clear to everyone working in his films that he was ill?

It's because Bruce Willis married his second wife when he was in his late fifties. He had another family by her and he wanted to provide for his children, some of whom are still very young, when he's gone. He knew his acting skills weren't what they used to be. He also knew that a lot of medical bills, speech therapy, nursing costs and expensive experimental treatments were in his future...

So he kept churning out movies. One after another. He won Razzies, even, for how terrible critics deemed his recent work. People made fun of him. They mocked him. Thought he was just someone soullessly making movie after movie only for the money. They did not dig into the reasons behind it. And that's tragic. Bruce Willis didn't want to make the sort of cutting-edge, deep, well-acted movies that'd require him to endlessly repeat takes... no, he wanted to get done quick, and be home again with his loved ones. Minimal effort, maximum reward, until the moment his condition deteriorated to the point where he no longer could.

He wanted to be an actor, he wanted to work, and he wanted to provide for his loved ones while he still could. He did that, and he did not mind the judgement of criticism. Because Bruce Willis is a man.

Source - <https://www.quora.com/profile/Pamela-Hayes-120>